Core Values: The Foundation for Authentic School Librarianship

When we live our core values, we also develop an authentic identity. We take actions based on our beliefs. We are true to our calling and to ourselves. And, when we combine our core values with authenticity, we have the opportunity to serve as effective and respected leaders in our learning communities.

Core Values in School Librarianship: Collaborating for Social Justice

Peter Langella, Suzanne Sannwald, and Kristin Fraga Sierra share how they have integrated social justice practices into their school librarian core values. Join this lively conversation moderated by Judi Moreillon.

Future Forward. School Libraries and Social Justice—A Partnership of Necessity

Developing collections and offering programming that prioritizes issues of social justice and diversity are equally important to the future as they were in the past. This is a heavy responsibility that school librarians bear, but one that I fully believe we can be entrusted with.

Intellectual Freedom and Privacy

As the protectors of students' access to information, librarians assume a leadership role in providing students with the right to seek and receive information representing various viewpoints without restriction. In this course, you'll learn the ethical and legal underpinnings of students' intellectual freedom and privacy and how these shape your library's policies and procedures.

Intellectual Freedom and Privacy News You Can Use

Intellectual freedom and privacy have been core values of librarians for decades. Although the principles remain strong, challenges to intellectual freedom and privacy in schools continue to evolve. Fortunately, there are resources to combat the threats to the right to read, view, and listen as well as to protect the privacy of library users.

Laying the Foundation for Inclusive Collections

Creating inclusive collections was a logical priority for our libraries in Charleston County School District (CCSD). With over 50,000 students, our district is racially, geographically, and economically diverse. Our teacher librarian demographics don't match this diversity, so it was even more important to focus on intentionally building and sustaining inclusive collections to ensure we could meet all our students' needs.

Leadership Is about You

The foundation of any strong, integrated school library program rests on the school librarian implementing, with colleagues, complex and demanding innovations like collaborative program planning and teaching and inquiry-based learning.

Leading Positive Change through Strong Relationships and Communication

Librarians who are effective leaders think about how to do better and plan for improvement. The ingredients for success in effecting change are found in establishing strong, positive relationships, and cultivating savvy communication skills.

Leveraging School Libraries to Support Student Learning: What Principals Need to Know

School administrators do need some background knowledge about the role of the school library in student learning and this knowledge doesn't happen by osmosis.

Making Collaboration Work

We sought to investigate practical ways that the school librarian and classroom teacher can collaborate at deeper levels to improve student learning and create equitable and meaningful learning experiences, within the constraints of systems that naturally impede collaboration. What follows are some tools, tips and resources for developing a culture of collaboration between classroom teachers and school librarians.

The Natural Leadership Role of the School Librarian

By identifying and understanding the natural leadership role of the school librarian, principals will be able to utilize the school librarian and library programs to help their schools flourish and be successful.

On Common Ground. Make the School Principal Your Ally

Everyone needs an ally who can help them be successful. For a school librarian, that person should be the principal. What a principal thinks about you and the school library program will shape the perception for the entire school community.

Operation Collaboration. Fostering School-Wide Collaboration

For us, some of our strongest collaborations during the past year have really been as co-participants in larger school-wide and district-wide initiatives that focus on how our wider community can best come together to support students. Having a seat at the table of these conversations has been a valuable and essential form of collaboration.

Programming with Diversity in Mind: Conducting a Diversity Audit

Have you noticed that the authors you share, the titles you display, the books you read to classes are often the ones that get checked out the most? Our populations are diverse and we need to be purposeful about the books we share (or "bless") so that they reflect our audience.

The Road to Diversity: Action Steps and Learning Steps

The business of enabling readers is a thread that ties together the numerous tasks and roles of the school librarian, from selecting books to teaching inquiry lessons to setting up a display. More than ever, it seems school librarians recognize that this work must reflect inclusivity and diversity of students, families, and community.

Take Action! Advocacy = Building Stakeholder Relationships

Now that the school year has begun and students have settled down to the business of learning, it is time to evaluate and rejuvenate your advocacy plan for the year. How will you engage your stakeholders and what will be the message you craft to garner support for your library program?

Understanding Advocacy for Effective Action

Elizabeth A. Burns finds the definition of advocacy fractured, and in a survey of 815 practicing, state-certified librarians, there is no consistent understanding of what advocacy means for librarians, their programs, and for school libraries. Burns reports on the AASL definition and how librarians can best develop advocacy through leadership and action.

We Need You! Forming Effective Advocacy Coalitions

In this article, I share how our advocacy team built support with the district's superintendent, school board members, and the community at-large in order to move this advocacy appeal forward. Through strategic planning and action as well as serendipity, the lessons learned from the TUSD School Librarian Restoration Project offer field-tested guidelines that can be applied in your school library advocacy appeal.
